All aboard!

The Trans-Siberian Railway is a network of railways and has the longest continuous railway line in the world. It is 10,000 km long and covers one third of the globe.

By the end of the 19th century, it was clear that Russia needed a transport route from the west, where Moscow is, to the eastern area of Russia known as Siberia. It was Alexander III, the Russian Tsar, who decided to build a railway line. Work began in 1891 and after Alexander's death, his son, Nicholas II, took over.

Today the line is the most important transport link within the country. It is used by Russians but also by foreign tourists. There are a number of routes to choose from. The most popular route is the Trans-Siberian Line which runs from the capital, Moscow, to Vladivostok, a seaport on the Pacific Ocean. The second route is the Trans-Manchurian Line which runs from Moscow to Beijing, the capital of China. The third route, the Trans-Mongolian, goes from Moscow to Beijing through Mongolia. And the fourth route, known as the Baikal Amur Mainline, runs further to the north and reaches the Pacific.

Travellers usually travel from west to east. However, it is possible to go in the opposite direction. It takes about a week to complete the Trans-Siberian journey. There are many stops along the way, which last from a few minutes to half an hour. Travellers can arrange to stay in many of the Russian cities and towns along the way. One of the most interesting sights is Lake Baikal - the deepest and oldest freshwater lake on Earth.

Some Trans-Siberian trains are actually hotels on wheels. For those who have money to spend, there's the Trans-Siberian Express with its luxurious, air-conditioned, first-class sleeping cars, a restaurant car which serves three meals a day and a shower car with towels and bath robes. In each sleeping car, there are two attendants who serve tea and coffee free of charge throughout the journey and make the beds.

One of the most enjoyable things about this journey is simply sitting back and watching the scenery. However, most travellers also find that getting to know people from around the world makes this journey an unforgettable experience.
