New Year's Eve in the UK

New Year's Eve is on 31st December. People all around the UK celebrate it. They have parties to say 'Goodbye' to the old year and say 'Welcome' to the new year.

In London, we go to the city centre to celebrate New Year's Eve. There are thousands of people in the streets around the River Thames and the London Eye. We count down the seconds to midnight, then we hug our friends and family and we sing Auld Land Syne, a traditional Scottish song about friends.

Nick

There are lots of New Year's Eve traditions in the UK. One tradition is to open the front door of your house at midnight. The idea is that the new year comes in and the old year goes out. In the past the tradition of 'first footing' was popular in the north of England and Scotland. The first visitor to a house after midnight brought some coal, some bread and some money. These things symbolize a warm home, food and success.

In Scotland, New Year's Eve is called Hogmanay. It's the most important winter festival for us and celebrations continue for four days. The celebrations in Edinburgh are very famous. My family and I go to Edinburgh Castle in the city centre. Lots of the men wear kilts! There's traditional bagpipe music and there are also rock and pop concerts. There's usually a ceilidh – a traditional Scottish dance party. People can learn traditional Scottish dances and they dance in the streets of the old city.

I live in Stonehaven, in the north of Scotland. There's a very special New Year's Eve celebration in our town. It's a fireball swinging procession. People make 'balls' of old newspapers and clothes. At midnight, they light the balls and walk through the streets. They swing the fireballs above their heads. Some people think the fireballs represent the sun in the middle of winter. I love this exciting tradition in my town.
