

I. READING

...At school he had been taught a song about larks in the spring that climbed an invisible ladder and vanished in the sky. That morning he got up and went indoors, past the high flowers that stood sunning themselves along the garden path, past the buzzing bees and the fruit trees with their whitewashed trunks. He went to the piano, climbed on the stool and took the cage down. Piet started to flutter excitedly. He took the cage out into the garden and looked up at the clouds; he wanted to say something, something important and fascinating that God would be sure to listen to. But his throat hurt too much and the memory of his defeat in the doctor's chair was still too fresh; he decided that a silent messenger would be all he could send up that day and he opened the cage.

Piet did not understand at first, but after a few minutes hopped onto the little threshold. They both sat very still for a long time, then Piet gave a questioning "Tweet?" and he whispered, "Tonsils." It was the only word he could think of that would tell it all to God, if only God could be made to listen.

Piet understood at once. He hopped first on the ground, then on top of the cage, and then, with a breathtaking surge of tremendous power for so small a creature, he rose straight up into the sky, fluttering wildly, higher and higher. When he had risen higher than the treetops, he started to sing. He sang more beautifully than any bird had ever sung before. He sang as if he had a little silver trumpet that rang out a song of joy and triumph. Then, when Joost was certain that God was listening and waiting for Piet to bring Him his message, the song suddenly stopped, as if it had been throttled; the wings that had carried their unique and priceless treasure of beauty and joy aloft stopped beating, and the bird plummeted back to earth...
