Captain Scott

Antarctica is a frozen continent. It's very cold and windy and there's snow and ice all year. People don't live in Antarctica because the weather there is too cold, but it's a very interesting place for scientists. They go there to study the weather and geology.

Captain Robert Scott was the first British explorer to go to Antarctica. His first expedition began in 1901. It was a terrible journey. There were strong winds and freezing temperatures. Scott and his men turned back before they arrived at the South Pole.

Scott wanted to try the journey to the South Pole again. He started his second expedition on 1st June 1910. He was now married and had a baby son. This time, there was a race between him and the Norwegian explorer Roald Amundsen.

The two men both wanted to get to the South Pole first. Scott and his men arrived there on 17th January 1912, but they found a Norwegian flag and a message from Amundsen. The Norwegian explorer was the winner. He and his men arrived at the South Pole 33 days before Scott.

Scott and his men started the journey back to camp. The weather was terrible with winds and lots of snow. His men were cold and hungry and they didn't have enough energy to walk. Scott and his men died. They were only 18 km from their camp.

Captain Scott wasn't the winner of the race to the South Pole, but he made some very important scientific discoveries. He wrote diaries and took photographs and he helped people to understand the weather, geography and geology of Antarctica.
