

I. READING

Scottish cyclist Mark Beaumont, who was born in 1983, showed a talent for sports at an early age. He completed his first long-distance bike ride at the age of twelve when he rode from John O'Groats at the top of Scotland, all the way down to Land's End in the south of England. Then, on 15 February 2008, Mark raised £18,000 for charity, and entered the Guinness World Records book, when he became the fastest person to cycle around the world. He completed his trip in 195 days and 6 hours, beating the record of 276 days, which had previously been set by another British man, Steven Strange.

Mark's trip began and ended in Paris and took him through twenty countries across Europe, the Middle East, India, Asia, Australia and North America. The speed of his journey was amazing. It took him only four hours to cross Holland and just three hours to cross Germany. He cycled across four American States in two days.

But Mark's trip included some unexpected problems. As well as his bike, Mark carried 80 kilograms of equipment that included a tent, tools and cameras. He had his wallet and camera stolen when he was staying in a motel in the USA. He came down with food poisoning in Lahore and was knocked off his bike in Louisiana by a motorist. He even had to change routes when he was crossing into Malaysia to escape the violence that was taking place in southern Thailand.

One of Mark's other problems was food. He had to eat around 6,000 calories a day in order to keep up his energy levels, which was often difficult to do. It meant that even though he is a vegetarian, he was forced to sometimes eat meat. In the Australian outback, where there are few shops, he often didn't have enough proper food, so he had to eat chocolate bars and tins of baked beans instead. In both Australia and the USA, he couldn't avoid junk food – not an ideal diet for a long-distance cyclist!

When Mark left Paris on 5 August 2007 to start his journey, only a small crowd was there to see him off. However, Mark kept a blog while he was travelling, so that people could follow his journey. More and more people followed his blog, with the result that on his return, thousands of people, hundreds of media representatives, and even the British Ambassador to France, gathered to welcome him back.
