

I. READING

Nowadays with low-cost air travel, cell phones, email and the Internet, teenagers see the world as a smaller place than it appeared to their grandparents. But the Internet seems to be the one with the most potential for global influence. People used to make friends locally at schools and continue those friendships into adulthood, but many young people today find the majority of their friendships over the Internet. This is not restricted to teenagers.

The Internet has also greatly affected how people buy and sell goods. International Internet shopping is now common, with people buying all sorts of goods, from sites such as Amazon, the most successful online retail site. The international auction site eBay allows millions of participants to buy from and sell to strangers, setting their own prices. But be aware – there are as many dishonest salespeople online as in the streets.

One of the Internet's greatest success stories is Wikipedia, the free online encyclopedia, which is compiled and updated by its users. It carries far more content than any other encyclopedia but remember to double-check important facts as it contains mistakes. The other major information resource on the Internet is Google, a research engine which finds and ranks web pages according to the number of links made to them.

Probably the biggest impact that the Internet has had is how it has influenced social networking services. People can meet new friends through sites like these, they can renew old acquaintances through sites like Friends Reunited and they can also play games with each other in virtual worlds such as Second Life. This Internet-based, three-dimensional virtual world is "inhabited" by more than 6.8 million residents from around the world.

Much of the power of the Internet lies in the fact that people are developing new ways to be resourceful and innovative. Collective creativity and collaboration are the key ideas. But even more powerful than this is its power to solve crimes, help change the world through giving to charities on sites like justgiving.com or find missing individuals: one website for a missing child was visited by over 40 million people within days of its being set up.
